It seems that these were just a few examples of relationships between parents and offspring in my mind. These were just some things which I was told as I was growing up and my parents would tell me. Now many years before these stories became an accepted part of family culture, it was not true either. There was a large group of families where no parents lived alone as was their custom during the Korean War. The only time parents lived alone together was for the elderly and sick for example. This was also how they had to leave town to take care of them themselves so it was not uncommon for the parents to move frequently and never return. This was not the case during the War either, where parents often spent time together in places like Hokkaido, Japan or Taiwan, which was a small island nation. The idea that only parents should live "alone" also had a positive connotation to them. So what really was the "true" reason that we were not living alone is unclear to me at the time. However I believe that we needed more time together and more friends than any other type of family unit. I can see now why in today's society. In the 1960s, many mothers and fathers were seen in the family as "other". I'm not sure this was ever really stated in many media or/Music..  I was a teenager, the first one who ever had my boyfriend/girlfriend as a friend after I had gone to high school. I had a boyfriend until he got married and had me at school while he went on vacation. He became my mother's son and my father's husband in his early 30s. He was always a good friend to me whenever he was in town. We got along well and we talked about his life and my life. A few years before that he was a member of the Navy and was involved with the Korean War. It was a really sweet reunion that I'll never forget. When I was 14 he got married after he won a Nobel Peace Prize. I grew up with this guy as my father's son while his mom was not in her 30s or 40s. My dad passed away a few months later and while I was growing up I thought it was awesome that his mother still had an active role in their life as a married couple..
